Before we begin.

There's something that happens when you leave a system that owned your insides.

You get out. You breathe. You think — okay, now I can be myself. And then you realize you don't quite know what that means yet. Not because you're broken. Because the self you're trying to be was never given room to form.

This is not a diagnostic. It's not a test. Nobody is going to read your answers and tell you what's wrong with you.

What this is: a map-making exercise. You're going to look at some territory that most people spend their whole lives carefully not looking at — because the system you came from had it fenced off, locked up, or actively on fire.

Some of what you find will make immediate sense. Some will surprise you. Some might make you cry or laugh or both simultaneously. All of it is information. None of it is verdict.

Take your time. There are no right answers. "I don't know yet" is one of the most honest and useful things you can write on this page.

You're safe here.

Who you are right now

What name do you want me to use for you?

How old are you?

Are you currently in a relationship? If so, what kind?

Are you currently in therapy or counseling?

How you're doing — honestly

On a scale of 1–10, how stable does your life feel right now?

What does a typical day feel like in your body?

When was the last time you felt genuinely at ease?

Your story in brief

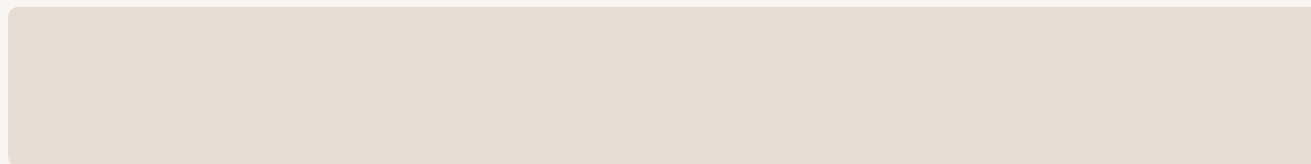

What religious or high-control community did you come from?

How long were you in it? When did you leave?

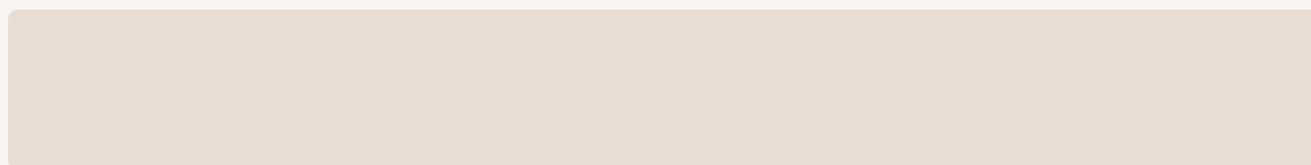

What was the hardest thing about leaving?

What brings you here

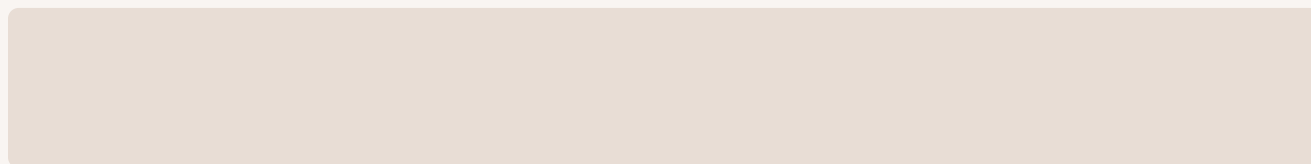

What made you seek this out right now?

What do you most want to change, explore, or understand?

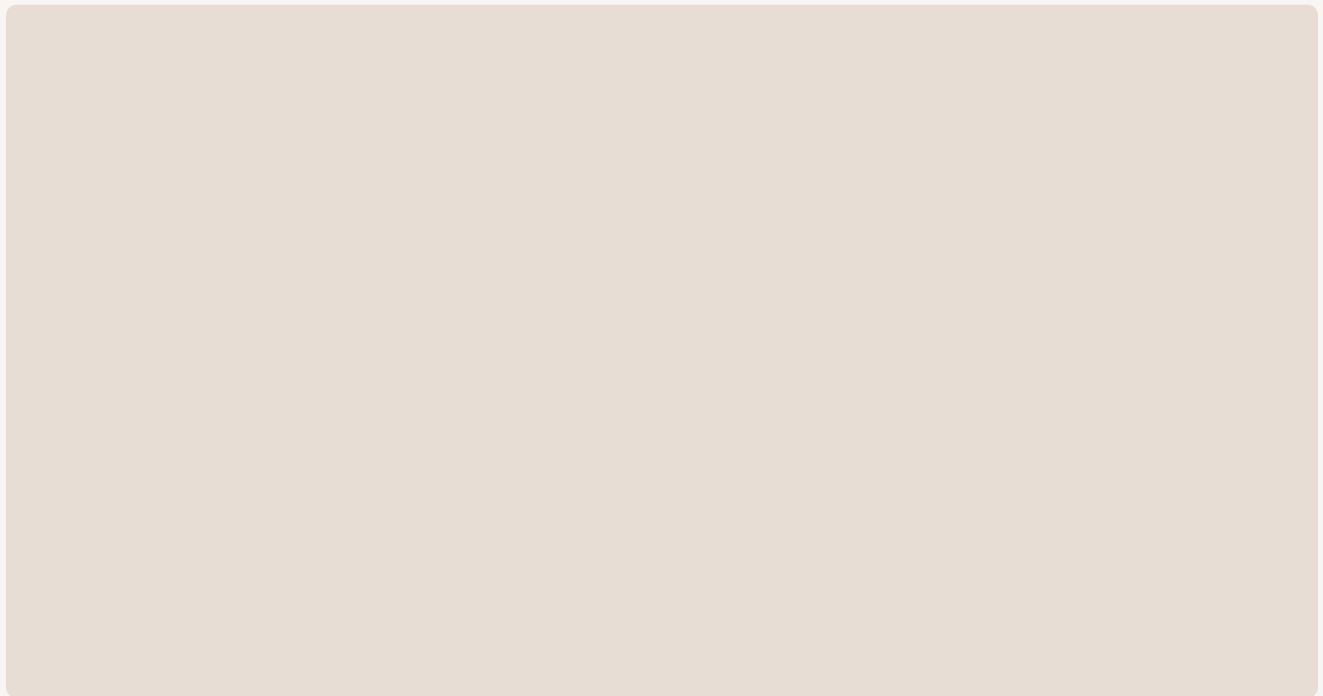

Is there anything you're afraid I'll ask about?

The most important question

Close your eyes for a moment. Imagine the version of yourself who is completely free — not performing wellness, not performing rebellion, just free. What does she look like? How does she move through the world? What does her intimate life feel like? Her emotional life? How does she stand in her own authority?

This is your compass.

Every score, every gap, every practice points back to the person you just described.

Keep her close.
